While we were lazily fishing for pike and golden eye, an ominous black wall of clouds began to rise rapidly in the Northwest, and the Big Traverse began to assume a forbidding aspect. Having reached the nearest land, we set our tent as low as possible, folding the upright walls under the Indian mat. One tent pole, which we had to use in the absence of a suitable tree, was securely lashed by means of three guy ropes, every tent stake was firmly driven into the ground, and for the unprotected side of the tent we made a wind break by turning the canoe on its side and lashing it to two stout poles. By this time the whole sky was overcast and the thunder rolled and rumbled in the distance. We ate a hastily cooked supper. The wind began to play in the rushes, the seabirds were flying low, looking for shelter, and it was growing dark. We took a last look at the ropes and guys and crept into the tent. The storm broke with the violence of an ocean hurricane. It bent the young cottonwood trees like slender flagpoles and spread the tall weeds and bushes flat on the ground. We knelt inside the tent, bracing the sides and doing our best to ease the strain on the canvas which flapped and bulged and was beaten about as if it had been pegged down on an open beach. Bolts...
