Excerpt: . ment of substances in the cells is in general normal. A good many larvae are abnormally segmented, often one cell having stopped in an early stage of cleavage, and the others having gone on and divided further. The larvae fixed at 21 hours (Fig. 11) are mostly abnormal, apparently, but one or two were found in the living material which showed even the long apical flagellum. On the whole the series approaches much more nearly to the normal development than any other series I have so far been able to obtain, chiefly because here, and nowhere else, could I get mitotic cleavage to any extent. The possibility of the development of unfertilized eggs to swimming larvae having been established, the question of inducing a cleavage process to accompany this development was the next important step. Cleavage obtained, it will now be necessary to vary conditions in such manner that the abnormalities arising in the cleavage with the present method may be avoided. The later development of the larvae, beyond the trochophore stage, I have not attempted, as my first interest lay in the initiation of normal development. IV. Combination Of Two Agents. In order to form a check on the effect of the various agents upon the unfertilized eggs, artificial parthenogenesis was supplemented by fertilization in a number of cases, --sperm being added after the eggs had been treated by a physico-chemical agent. In other cases the effect of supplementing the action of...
