Walfridus Strabon, a learned Benedictine of the ninth century, has these words in his work, De Officiis Divinis: -- Et nonnulli presbyterorum sibi licere existimant, ut sub casula dalmatica vestiantur. Traces of this custom, however, were remaining in France till the Revolution in the last century. De Moleon, in describing the Church of S. Agnan of Orleans, mentions that on Holy Saturday the celebrant was vested in a white dalmatic chasuble. According to Georgius, the dalmatic was, at one time, proper to the deacons of Rome: and conceded gradually to deacons in other parts of the Church. Later the privilege of wearing the tunic and dalmatic under the chasuble was granted to Abbots. (See Mitred Abbot.) The use of the dalmatic was also conceded to kings and emperors, both at their coronation and when solemnly assisting at the Holy Sacrifice....
