Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: . or screwed down, the rivets pass ng through holes in the clamp for that purpose. A loop in the end of the clamp permits of fastening the rope. To pull through a length of 500 or 1,000 feet will require considerable power; cable contractors use a winch and capstan for this purpose, so constructed that it (the winch) can be placed in the manhole, while the men can work the capstan bars above ground. But where there is not cable enough to justify this expense, double pulley blocks will do almost as well. The method of using capstans in different positions is illustrated in Fig-35, which shows the apparatus employed by the Standard Underground Cable Co., Pittsburg, Pa.1 In districts where few wires are taken off, a heavy pole probably furnishes the simplest method of distribution, using either double arms faced at right angles to each other, or a circular iron ring about 6 feet across, and held in place by braces made to fit ring and pole. The ring is of angle iron with the lip of the upper angle turned outward. Angle braces are made to fit this ring and pole, both above and below. Around the outer projecting lip of the rim are drilled J-inch holes about 4 inches apart, and through these is passed a bolt to connect two porcelain knobs--one above and one below the lip--thus making place for two wires at each drilled hole. Where a large number of...
